Thinking Speaker Series. This year’s presenters are all exceptional women. Last night (at the time of writing this) we had just heard Anita Sarkeesian share her experiences responding to online harassment and the strong efforts of her organization (Feminist Frequency) to encourage various media to respond better to women, basic human rights and a variety of diversities.

At the end of February, Marie Henein will be in town for a much-anticipated presentation, “Reflections on Justice and Leadership.” And, later on in the year, Jen Kish, Arlene Dickinson and Candy Palmater will be on tap. Please join us if you can.

As you can see, the topics and the format are consistent with ECF’s vision for a more inclusive community — a place where complex and challenging issues are discussed and where people work together toward solutions. We are delighted to partner with EPL in this important endeavour.

True grit

A new endowment fund is JudyLynn Archer’s latest contribution to her life’s passion – Women Building Futures

BY: DAVID RYNING
PHOTOGRAPHY: COOPER & O’HARA
If you want something, it’s up to you to make it happen.”

For 13 years, that philosophy shaped JudyLynn Archer’s vision as CEO and president of Women Building Futures (WBF), an organization dedicated to helping women find employment in careers where women are under-represented. It is also at the heart of the JudyLynn Archer Endowment Fund that she created at Edmonton Community Foundation (ECF) upon her retirement at the end of 2016, which will help cover tuition and housing costs in perpetuity for students in need. If women are provided with the tools to succeed, she believes, they will make it happen.

In conversation, Archer is warm, frank and passionate about WBF. There is also an inner strength that surfaces as she talks. Her grittiness was forged in the grinding poverty of her childhood.

“We were on welfare, we lived in low-rental housing…” Archer says. “I hated it. And I hated the way it made me feel.”

The desire to improve — first her own life and then the lives of others — has driven Archer forward for her entire adult life.

“JudyLynn is a force of nature,” says Kathy Kimpton, Archer’s successor at WBF.

While Archer’s career included stops in the trucking industry, library science and the public service, it was with WBF that she found her passion and a means to truly “pay it forward.”

Along the way, she has collected many accolades — the Women’s Executive Network Top 100 Most Powerful Women in Canada Award, a Global TV Woman of Vision Award, a NAIT Honorary Diploma in Construction Engineering Technology, the Alberta Apprenticeship & Industry Training Chairman’s Award of Excellence, to name only a few — and brought together women who were looking for better jobs with employers who were searching for skilled workers.

WBF, founded by a group of social workers in 1998, embraced a mission that was a mix of idealism and hard-headed reality. One aim, Archer says, was to “move the needle on poverty” — an aspiration that is easier to dream than achieve. Balancing it, though, was a clear-eyed assessment of the job market and the recognition of a void that WBF could help fill.

A shortage of qualified workers loomed in Alberta as a large segment of tradespeople neared retirement. WBF worked with a portion of the population that was under-represented in the construction industry: women. The solution was win-win — help women enter the trades, and help industry find the workers it required.
Archer, who began working with WBF in 2003, remembers the early years as spartan. “We found a place on Jasper Avenue; it was just this little basement. It was actually just 4,000 square feet of concrete and one light bulb. We signed a three-year lease without having any idea how we were actually going to do anything: make the lease payments, build a training centre, anything like that. But we did.”

Through hard work, ingenuity and the generosity of supporters, the dream of WBF slowly became reality. “We scrounged lumber, heat ducting, lights, ceiling tiles: everything,” Archer says. “We built this lovely — small — training centre with a tool crib and a classroom, just with tools and the women coming over who were interested in helping. During that three-year period, we began to really feel we were on to something.”

The small basement centre was eventually replaced, with assistance from many stakeholder partners, with the new WBF Housing Facility and Suncor Energy Training Centre on 107 Street in Edmonton that features training workshops, classrooms and 42 units of student housing, 18 of which are earmarked for mothers and their children. It was purchased in 2005, and officially opened in 2008.

Archer wasn’t the only one. Buy-in from industry and government partners followed. “When we shared our vision with our stakeholders, they began to surround us one by one, year over year, until the dream was no longer WBF’s. It had become a shared vision.” Archer says.

WBF has certainly grown since those early days. In addition to the housing and training centre on 107 Street, its main administrative office is on 109 Street, in the former home of an architecture firm. The main office is an open space, marked by soaring ceilings and dramatic use of brick and wood. It calls to mind possibilities and potential.

In the entranceway is a chalkboard covered in inspirational slogans and expressions of WBF’s ideals.
“You are part of a legacy of trailblazers. #indigenouswomenrise,” says one.

“Together we are part of something very powerful,” says another.

In a meeting room, Kimpton, the new CEO and president of WBF, talks about the past, present and future of the organization, and of her predecessor’s contributions. Kimpton is funny and self-deprecating, but speaks quickly, with energy and purpose. When Kimpton saw the opportunity with WBF, it resonated with her.

JudyLynn’s real legacy is her impact, which is changing the face of the construction industry.

“I said to my husband, after reading the job description, ‘That makes my heart sing,’ ” Kimpton says. “And it’s because it is focused on women who are faced with barriers.”

The organization that Kimpton took on in 2017 has evolved dramatically from the one Archer came to in 2003. The organization boasts strong relationships with stakeholder partners, an ever-increasing array of programs for its clients, and even a new office in Fort McMurray. It is well-established as a source of safe, skilled workers and works hard to be responsive to the needs of its students and industry.

What hasn’t changed is WBF’s dedication to helping women get into the program, regardless of their means.

“We do not want lack of money to hold someone back from realizing their dreams,” Archer says.

Kimpton echoes that statement, noting that the organization serves clientele who are often disadvantaged and may lack confidence or even hope.

“They get ‘no’ all over the place,” Kimpton says. “And they say ‘no’ to themselves. It’s our job to find a way to say ‘yes.’”

A point of pride for WBF is the meaningful difference it has made in improving opportunities for Indigenous women. According to the latest figures, WBF is engaged with 48 Indigenous communities and 26 per cent of WBF graduates are Indigenous.

WBF can promote some impressive outcomes — 2,000 graduates to date; over 90 per cent employment rate for graduates and on average, depending on the trade, an increase in earnings ranging from 132 to 250 per cent.

In 2017, Archer cemented her ongoing commitment to WBF with the establishment of an endowment fund created at Edmonton Community Foundation. Archer’s $100,000 personal donation was matched by North West Refining and Canadian Natural Resources Limited. Archer says she plans to grow the fund for the next five years to help support students with tuition and housing costs.

She says the fund “is a way of acknowledging all the individuals who share our dream and continue to walk hand-in-hand with us to achieve it.”

Presently, WBF continues its mission, giving women choice and opportunity for a more prosperous future. Their national awareness campaign “You Got This,” and hints at future expansion indicate that the momentum established under Archer’s leadership is being maintained.

Kimpton says that Archer’s legacy to WBF runs much deeper than the endowment fund that bears her name.

“JudyLynn’s real legacy is her impact, which is changing the face of the construction industry.”

Among the slogans on the board at the entrance of the WBF office is a phrase that captures the spirit of WBF, but could just as well have been written about JudyLynn Archer personally.

“She believed she could,” it reads. “So she did.”
At the turn of the hour, it’s standing room only in the reception area of the YWCA Counselling Centre in downtown Edmonton as clients wait for their appointments to begin. Within minutes, the seats empty one-by-one as each client’s psychologist ushers them through the maze-like office space to counselling rooms in the back. Here, they are safe to share the darkest parts of their histories, including experiences with domestic abuse, sexual assault, and even human trafficking.

“One of our areas of expertise is in domestic violence and trauma,” says Ashley Lim, a registered psychologist and Director of the YWCA’s counselling services. A large proportion of the centre’s clients struggle with PTSD and are involved with the court system (most as victims, not perpetrators of crimes). The average client is 33 years old and female (women made up 87% of the clientele in 2017), but Lim says the YWCA’s clientele is diverse and includes youth (15%), immigrants (1%), and Indigenous people (11%). A large proportion of clients are LGBTQ (14%) and many have disabilities (18%).
Lim says that most of the centre’s clients have struggled not only to find counselling they can afford, but counsellors who understand trauma. Many have grown frustrated with the search and exhausted by re-telling their story again and again. “It’s not uncommon that we’re their last option,” she says. Unlike other services in Edmonton, the YWCA offers counsellors with special training in trauma treatment for children and adults, and provides no- or low-cost therapy for as long as clients need it. “We don’t put a limit on how long the healing is going to take because we don’t know that and they don’t know that,” Lim says. “It’s how the process unfolds.” Most people attend eight or nine sessions, but some clients come for years. And even when a client has been discharged, they’re always free to come back whenever they need support, whether for individual counselling — the bulk of the centre’s services — group therapy, educational workshops, family therapy, or play therapy for their children.

With no comparable resources in Edmonton, and rising rates of domestic abuse and sexual assault in our community, the YWCA has seen the demand for its counselling services rise steadily in recent years. In 2017, the centre saw a 23% increase in appointments and a 26% increase in the number of people accessing it. Of the 3,800 counselling sessions provided that year, 99% were fully or partially subsidized and the number of clients unable to pay anything at all rose 92% from the previous year.

At the moment, the wait list is at least three months for most clients, although those in the most vulnerable situations are moved up the list, and generally wait about a month. “The maximum wait should be no more than two weeks,” says Lim, noting that after that time, victims of violence are more likely to have moved beyond the initial crises that motivated them to reach out, but they remain in the abusive situation.

In the past, Lim and her colleagues managed to whittle the wait list down to zero a couple of times each year, but this hasn’t happened for two years despite the YWCAs best efforts. Lim explains that frontline staff have been working frantically to shorten the wait list: “I’m concerned about how long my staff can maintain this pace.”

But a new grant from Edmonton Community Foundation could change everything for the counselling centre’s staff and clients. Over the next three years, the YWCA will receive $75,000 per year to partially fund a PhD-level counselling psychologist (the full cost of the position and overhead is $125,000) who will not only take on their own caseload, but will allow the centre, which is a teaching facility, to accept two to four additional master’s students and PhD student interns who will also treat clients. All told, the new position will increase the YWCA’s capacity for counselling by 150%.

“This grant is transformational for us. It’s the right grant at the right time,” says YWCA Edmonton CEO Jacqueline Foord. “The fact of the matter is, over the last few years, the number of calls to EPS reporting domestic violence has gone up. The number of sexual assaults has also gone up. The work we do with victims of domestic abuse and sexual assault is needed today more than ever.”

Not only will the grant allow the YWCA to shorten its wait list and serve more clients, it will ease the pressure on other mental health services in the city that are also feeling the strain. And, since the YWCA is a teaching facility, hiring a PhD trauma specialist will ultimately increase the number of psychologists in the community who have the training to work with victims of violence. “It moves beyond the work of the YWCA,” says Foord. “It impacts the health of our entire city.”

In Edmonton’s LRT stations, Carla Rae Taylor and AJA Louden create six massive murals for Treaty 6 to keep reconciliation on-track

BY: MINISTER FAUST
Today’s planet of plugged-in people with eyes glued to screens may not visit art galleries very often, and even if they do, they might not look up from their phones. So why not bring the art directly to tens of thousands of people on their way to work?

That’s the goal of Paint the Rails, a grand, multi-venue mural envisioned for six Edmonton LRT stations over the next two years. One is already complete at Churchill station, and the next will wrap itself up seven storeys of stairs inside the University station, becoming a three-dimensional painting that “frames” viewers themselves.

The project is a partnership between the John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights (JHC) and Edmonton Transit Service. Maigan van der Giessen, the Creative Lead at JHC, calls herself the “adoptive mother” of the project and in 2017 she secured $15,000 from Edmonton Community Foundation to produce Paint the Rails.

To produce this Canada 150 legacy project in partnership with the City of Edmonton and Edmonton Transit, van der Giessen recruited Edmonton-based artist AJA Louden, mentees Dana Belcourt and Matthew Cardinal, and lead artist Carla Rae Taylor to begin work in 2017 and finish in 2019, the 141st year of Treaty 6.

“I absolutely love art, and I love people’s stories,” says St. Albert-born and Yellowknife-raised Taylor. For her, the dream world and her Dene heritage have long guided her introspection, including through art studies at Penticton’s En’owkin Centre, the University of Victoria, the Pacific Design Academy, and her last five years as art co-ordinator at Edmonton’s iHuman Youth Society.

“A lot of my work has been the retelling of stories,” she says, “whether it’s from my own background, stories I’ve heard from around the world, or things imparted to me from elders or friends. This was a chance to dive into stories from the community.”

ecfoundation.org
The stories arose during eight months in 2017 when van der Giessen, Taylor, and Louden, using an historical timeline of the city to help focus discussions, consulted with Edmonton community members, elders, and knowledge-keepers from a range of cultural communities.

“We had engagement sessions and got to hear the stories and gain input from people on what should be seen in the mural,” explains Taylor, adding that some people described their own pathways through the cataclysm of colonialism and residential schools.

“Putting Indigenous voices at the centre can serve the end goal of reconciliation,” says Louden, and bridge the “shared heritage to open channels of communication.”

If the artists secure enough funding to complete Paint the Rails, their electrifying murals will undoubtedly power conversation, inspiration, and ideally, reconciliation itself.
Pay it forward.

INDEPENDENCE
THROUGH ACHIEVEMENT

Recipient of Don and Norine Lowry Award for Women of Excellence looks forward to bright future

BY: TENDISAI CROMWELL    PHOTOGRAPHY: VICTOR MA
Over the summer, Helen Ma enjoyed ordinary pleasures. She spent her days buried between the pages of books and in the company of friends and family. But for Ma, summer was also a time of transition and anticipation of a new chapter of life that was about to begin: the pursuit of higher education.

Before beginning her studies at the University of Alberta, the 17-year-old received a notification that would impact her academic journey and, ultimately, her sense of self. Helen was one of five women selected for the Don and Norine Lowry Awards for Women of Excellence in 2017, a student award administered by Edmonton Community Foundation.

“It’s a real honour to be selected. It shows many people support me and feel like I’m worth supporting,” says Ma. “An award of this calibre targeted towards a specific group is so important.”

Ma, who uses a motorized wheelchair, has spinal muscular atrophy, a genetic disorder that affects the control of muscle movement. She articulated a desire for greater independence, which the award and her educational pursuits are steps toward.

“Independence, for me, is being able to succeed on my own terms,” she says. “I want to be independent, which is, primarily for me, achieved through education.”

Ma is no stranger to scholastic achievement. She graduated from high school with an impressive average of more than 95 per cent, becoming valedictorian of her graduating class. The previous summer, when most students were eager to spend time away from school, the then 16-year-old immersed herself in scientific research through a summer STEM program offered by the University of Alberta, geared toward female high school students.

After exposure to a wide range of career options in the sciences, Ma emerged from the program considering a career as a genetic counsellor, a burgeoning field of healthcare professionals who provide information about genetic disorders and help individuals make informed decisions.

“My condition is genetic, so I think I could bring a lot to the table and give a fresh perspective,” Ma says.

Don and Norine Lowry say they established the fund for women just like her. “Helen Ma exemplifies the type of woman we want to help,” Norine Lowry says. “It’s truly a privilege to help her in a small way.”

Don Lowry echoes this sentiment. “Helen has put courage, motivation, and determination in a league of its own,” he says. “We value that drive for continual improvement.”

The Lowrys created the award in 2013 with the support of EPCOR, where Don served as president and CEO until his retirement. Applications are open to Edmonton-based women of all ages, pursuing post-secondary studies in a wide range of fields including healthcare, water, energy, accounting and beyond.

“We felt that there are still many inspiring women who don’t have the same opportunities or support and have more difficulty getting into the professional workforce,” says Norine.

Over the lifetime of the fund, 14 women have received awards, which are managed by Edmonton Community Foundation.

“They’ve got resources, people, and experience that really know how to do the best in this area,” Don explains. “They also provide us guidance, help and support.”

The Lowrys, who have two daughters working in professional environments, say the award is a legacy they hope to leave for future generations of women in the city.

For a young woman like Ma, who considers the award life-changing, she imagines what future professional success might convey to others who need the support that was provided to her.

“If I were able to achieve a degree of professional success,” she says, “I think it would show other individuals who have genetic conditions or parents who have children with genetic conditions that it’s not something that takes away their ability to change the world; their ability to give back to society.”

The difficulties of settling in to a new country are myriad. While many immigrants join the workforce and experience discrimination or ambivalence about their previous work and education levels, others — often women — are left in social seclusion. Tracy Folorunsho-Barry was one of those women. Coming to Canada from Nigeria at age 17, she spent years feeling lost. “When you are new to a country there are a lot of challenges. Integration, making connections, the culture shock, trying to find yourself. It was really tough,” she says. “I didn’t want to go out because I was ashamed of myself. For a decade of my life I didn’t know what I was supposed to do. I started to have babies and more babies to keep myself busy. There was a lot of missed opportunities. Coming to Canada, it turned out that opportunity was everywhere, but I didn’t know how to use it.”

Most days she was at home, caring for her young children, and the isolation began to take a toll.

“I saw a lot of immigrant women doing well. I thought, what am I doing wrong? These women are doing amazing things, becoming businesswomen, going back to school, doing things in the community, and being mothers too.”

Seeing the successes of those peers began to inspire Folorunsho-Barry, now a mother of five. She decided to turn her experience into a positive model to help immigrant women reach their career and social goals; in 2016 she founded the Gradual Rising of Women (GROW) network, which offers a fresh perspective and community engagement opportunities beyond the typical resources that cater to immigrant populations. The organization regularly holds networking and development events, plus an annual conference and awards ceremony that recognizes and celebrates the achievements of immigrant women in the community.

While working as an intern at Edmonton Immigrant Services in the spring of 2017, she began to gather stories from immigrant women in the community, knowing that just hearing of others’ triumphs and struggles helped inspire her own journey.

“I imagined, what would happen if I could get immigrant women who are successful to start talking about their stories, to talk about the women they are today? That would be awesome.” Come summer, she applied for funding through Edmonton Community Foundation (ECF), and received $10,000 for her new venture: Project150.

The goal of GROW’s Project150 at first was simple: Collect 150 stories from women about their different journeys to success in Canada. Folorunsho-Barry put out a call to immigrant-focused organizations across the country asking for stories in 300 words, with the aim to eventually publish an anthology. Quickly, she realized the word count was nowhere near enough for the empowering messages the respondents were willing to divulge.

“Things got emotional,” she says. People wanted to share more, to go into detail. Project150 soon bore the Speak Out Women series, which is ongoing at various cafés and venues in Edmonton this year. Conversation cafés with Project150 participants have appeared in Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Calgary, and Folorunsho-Barry sees the series as an integral part of the project’s overall aim: To reach out with stories of immigrant women’s struggles and successes, and in turn inspire those hearing the stories to dream bigger, get connected, and embrace their experience as new Canadians.

In October, Giselle General was in the audience at one of the Edmonton cafés. She listened as Dr. Svetlana Pavlenko talked about arriving here from Novosibirsk (she aptly noted that Edmonton was not so different in climate from Siberia). Pavlenko struggled to find work in the academic field she was accustomed to in Russia, and ended up working as a receptionist in a car dealership. She eventually rose to salesperson of the year at the dealership, and at the time of the conversation café, was campaigning for a seat on Edmonton’s city council. General listened and felt inspired, then signed on to be part of the project.

General came to Canada from the Philippines as a teenager in 2007 after the deaths of both her parents in a vehicle crash. She had also experienced sexual assault by an older male relative, and began therapy on coping with the double trauma.

“Mental health isn’t really paid attention to back home. There’s so much awareness and encouragement about mental health values and norms of politics in Canada, and of other religions. What I’ve found living in Canada, for myself it’s very empowering."

As for Project150’s endgame, Folorunsho-Barry notes that the rest of the stories are still rolling in, and it won’t be long before the collection is ready for publication. Even so, the eventual printing may be more like icing a cake that’s half eaten; the effects of the story-sharing exercise are already spreading with the speakers series and the engagement the women experience after their moment onstage.

“They feel empowered,” she says. “I see them coming out in Avenue Magazine’s Top 40 Under 40; their workplaces or organizations are recognizing their achievements. The women in these stories are getting a lot of rewards.”

General is keen to see Project150 grow, too, knowing the comfort and confidence it provides to many women experiencing challenges as new Canadians.

“It reassures the audience and the other immigrant ladies that we all go through these struggles, or that sometimes the struggle is different; however, our transformation always has similar themes.”

“IT REASSURES THE AUDIENCE AND THE OTHER IMMIGRANT LADIES THAT WE ALL GO THROUGH THESE STRUGGLES, OR THAT SOMETIMES THE STRUGGLE IS DIFFERENT; HOWEVER, OUR TRANSFORMATION ALWAYS HAS SIMILAR THEMES.”
The South Alberta Light Horse regiment traces its roots in this province to 1885. It was raised as a volunteer mounted unit known as the Rocky Mountain Rangers for service in the Northwest Rebellion in the region that subsequently became Alberta.

As Dr. Stanley Milner observes, “While the Rocky Mountain Rangers never fired a shot in anger during the few months of its existence, it did provide effective and highly mobile security to many settlements in the District of Alberta during a very challenging time in our nation’s history.”

“This force, raised 133 years ago, is one of many Alberta units that are perpetuated, merged or have been amalgamated into the South Alberta Light Horse regiment,” says Milner.

Now, Milner has created the Lorraine Ginther Milner South Alberta Light Horse Memorial Fund in memory of his late wife Lorraine Ginther Milner, who died in 2014. She was a keen supporter of the South Alberta Light Horse Regiment Foundation – a charity that supports the regiment.

“We wanted to have a fund available in perpetuity in order to assist members of the regiment, who are part of the Reserve Army, and their families while the soldiers are deployed, as well as retired soldiers who may be in need,” says Milner. “Funds will also go to education for qualified serving and retired members of the regiment.

“As you look at the requirements of the soldiers, both young and older, education is absolutely essential,” Milner adds.

The South Alberta Light Horse regiment has squadrons based in Edmonton and Medicine Hat, as well as a troop in Lethbridge, and has about 140 soldiers in its ranks.

Since 1905, its badge has been the head of the pronghorn antelope, which is native to southern Alberta and known for its swiftness and keen eyesight, two key strengths demanded of light cavalry.

Despite its name, the regiment doesn’t own any horses, though it does use horses for ceremonial purposes. “They are basically an armoured regiment – the cavalry became tankers,” says Milner.

Milner is a fervent supporter of the military. “It’s an integral part of our society,” he says. “There’s an old saying, ‘He who wants peace, prepares for war.’ You’re never going to get away from conflict. The army is also used in all sorts of civilian emergencies, from forest fires to flooding, and is, of course, deployed overseas as the government sees fit.”

He hopes awareness of the new memorial fund will spur others in the community to set up funds in support of the Canadian military.

13% spike in sexual assaults in Edmonton over 2016.
In the first seven months of 2017, around 540 victims reported being sexually assaulted to police in Edmonton, 63 more compared to this time last year.

In 2014, police chief Rod Knecht reported, “I can tell you we have six or seven serious sexual assaults in the city every weekend, so every Friday and Saturday night.”

3 THINGS YOU CAN DO:

LISTEN.
Allow women to speak without interruption. Research shows that women are interrupted far more than men. It is only courteous to listen to each other. The other part of listening is hearing – so when a woman says she has been harassed, hear that she feels victimized.

SPEAK UP.
It’s just a joke, right? No harm was meant. It feels differently on the receiving end. Speak up for your fellow human and make it a less caustic atmosphere. This is especially true on social media where it is easy to say harmful things anonymously.

ADVOCATE.
Publicly support universal policies that do not discriminate, either in purpose or effect, based on race, gender, sexual orientation, class, etc. And, identify situations where people are being treated unequally and speak up for equal treatment. It is the right thing to do.
